QUESTION 3

A retailer recently upgraded their IBM Sterling Order Management from an older version to 9.1. While verifying the installation after the upgrade was completed, the resource manager found that the APIs were not returning data from the extended columns of product tables. The release manager believes the root cause to be a defective build process. Which aspect of the build process was defective?

A. The build process was not using the correct version of the JVM to compile the custom classes.

B. There is nothing wrong with the build process. Data from extended columns will not be carried over as part of an upgrade.

C. In order to view data from extended columns, custom classes following the "data access object" pattern have to be written and compiled as part of the build process.

D. The database extension xml was not present in the correct folder and hence the build process was not including it and did not detect any of the database extensions.
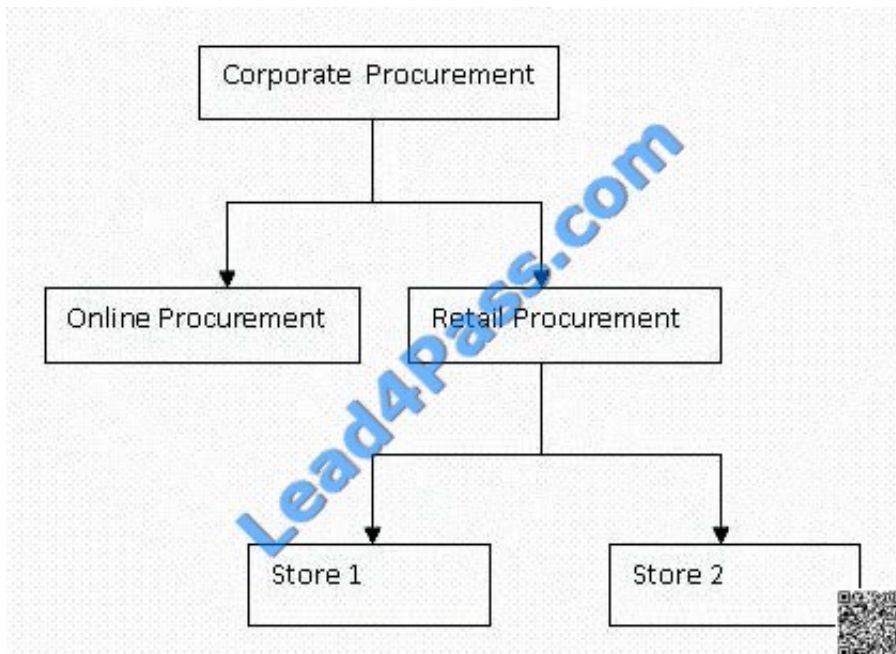

Correct Answer: D
